Communication is concerned with one of the most distinctly human characteristics: the use of spoken language to communicate information, maintain social contact, and influence others. Communication is an attractive major because it provides students with a broad liberal arts education, while at the same time focusing on vital communication skills, which are in high demand in the workplace as well as in political, religious and social communities. Communication skills include public speaking, argumentation, technical communication, leading teams and groups to solve problems, interviewing to gather information and to persuade, use and evaluation of communication technology, as well as a thorough array of communication research methods applications.

Degree requirements include the study of rhetorical and communication theories, the study of communication research methods, and the use of those theories and research methods in a variety of communication contexts. Such contexts include health communication, intercultural communication, interpersonal communication, mass media and new communication technologies, organizational communication, political rhetoric, religious communication, and others. Students use their communication skills to become leaders in all areas of business, social and political life.

The career interests of communication majors vary. Some students pursue advanced degrees in communication, law, business, or religion. Others take communication-related positions in strategic communication, public relations, marketing and sales, training and human resources, leadership and management, health fields related to communication, organizations and public policy, communication media, and related areas of business, industry, government, and non-profit organizations. Still others prepare for teaching careers.

The Department of Communication has a well-established Honors plan and strong linkages to the University honors program. Honors courses are available in all areas of Communication. In addition, students may graduate with honors in Communication noted on the transcript. Honor students may also choose individualized instruction through COMM 497, and through honors contracting. Students interested in the Department’s Honors Program should contact the Communication Undergraduate Studies Office.

The Department of Communication offers courses in many areas of the discipline: Health Communication, Media Studies, Organizational Communication, Rhetoric and Public Affairs, Leadership and Civic Dialogue and Strategic Communication with significant focus in Intercultural and International communication across each area.

The Department of Communication offers four certificates. While these certificates are optional, they permit a student to focus studies in one of four areas. The certificates in Communication and Global Media, in Communication Leadership and Conflict Management, and in Health Communication are open to students in the Department of Communication and in any major across the University. The certificate in Strategic Communication is offered to students majoring in Communication or in Telecommunication Media Studies only.
